0 out of 5 stars Verified Purchase See video upload of a walnut and epoxy serving tray the point isn't whether you like to mix epoxy into your wood projects, but it's notoriously much harder to sand epoxy properly compared to hardwoods, so I include it for reference. This unit has a fairly aggressive stroke, but if you use proper slow movement technique i.e. 1" per second and progress through the grits properly, you can achieve very good finish sanding results, even though it can also hog out material on forced rotation mode in lower grits really well too. I think this is as close as you can get to an allinone sander, especially for a decent price. Dust extraction is great, especially with net sandpaper because the pad has a ton of both large and small hole patterns.two rows of the larger holes so double what you get in a standard big box sander plus tons of small holes similar to what you see on the more advanced Festool or 3M sandpaper. I bet the Mirka Deros wild beat this unit in finish sanding and maybe even on some other categories, and probably festool could beat it in a category like dust extraction potentially, but not sure either of those or any other sander does all that this one does for the price you pay for the Bosch. Just get this one and invest in your preferred sandpaper brand with the money you save. Original I am very impressed by this unit. It handles extremely well. Turbo mode has more power than you can imagine but creates a beautiful and productive result. In my first use, I smoothed rough walnut stock in quick time and then went to a finer grit with the regular orbital mode to achieve an incredible surface on which to apply Rubio Monocoat. Even with a cheap shop vac, dust collection exceeded my expectations. There are very many smaller holes in addition to the normal larger ones that universal sanding papers have.

My belief is that the 2nd generation is better positioned to take advantage of improving sand paper dust extraction technology and the new sanding nets.Verified Purchase Verified Purchase I have been using flap disks on an angle grinder for that heavy material removal, particularly on just cut logs that I make into planks or dics. Even with a dust catching cover this produces a lot of dust and leaves the surface uneven. So then you have to use a planer or belt sander to try and get down to the point where the normal orbital sander can begin its job. Especially on large projects this really makes a difference. You can actually feel with your hand the oscillation change when you flip modes from turbo to fine sanding. On turbo it is difficult to hold you hand even lightly against the bare pad as it is really moving, and in large orbits. I may still need the planer or angle grinder to get something into a state where this can take over but It saved me a lot of time so far in just a couple days of use. The vacuum port is great. The extension gets the hose attachment all the way to the back of the handle OR you can use the adapter right off the sanding head if you feel it gives you more suction. As you can see in the pics the pad is really well thought out to give you the option to use just about any brand of sandpaper you want. I have 5in 8 hole pads myself, but this looks like it will fit most anything out there designed for 5inch orbital sanders to give you plenty of dust removal. I really debated about getting the 6inch, but I am glad I stuck with the 5inch, so now the drawer full of sanding pads I have isn't obsolete. The noise it makes is different, much more like an angle grinder. I don't know if that is from the direct drive or what. I always have my hearing protector headphones on with some music so it makes no difference to me as a usability factor just noting it.

The bump guard is a nice little edition, I can see it being helpful for sanding recessed faces in something like a door, or along a baseboard on flooring. It is removable when you don't want it. Verified Purchase I had to go around a number of large posts and under a staircase so a large drum sander would have been impractical. Slipped the hose of my old commercial vacuum cleaner over the attachment and had no dust. Cuts as well as a belt sander but with better control. I used turbo mode with the coarse grits 406080 and switched to orbital after that. Really liked the clip on bumper so I could get close to the walls without cutting into them. The whole process took days with lots of breaks but the result was worth it. Sorry, we failed to record your vote. Please try again Verified Purchase Sorry, we failed to record your vote.
